Reading

YOPEY

Whilst barely a week goes by without seeing dramatic tabloid headlines about teenage criminality, it is rare to come across any positive stories about young people in the press. Indeed, anyone reading newspapers would conclude that the younger generation must be made up of the worst sort of criminals. That's why Young People of the Year, or YOPEY, is such a breath of fresh air. What it aims to do is give young people a fairer image in the media by highlighting their achievements. It does this by spreading good news stories about young people by asking celebrities, politicians and well-known companies to endorse or sponsor their campaign, and by running schemes which get young people to work with vulnerable older people. Its main focus, though, is on getting ordinary people to nominate under-nineteens in their community who have helped others, and then presenting them with an award. Not only does the award make young people feel positive about themselves, but the publicity surrounding it inspires other kids to try to help in their community. If only the media were to focus on covering award schemes like this one, rather than devoting so much coverage to stories of petty crime. To my mind, it would not only reveal to society just how many young people get a lot out of life by helping their local communities, but it would also remind us all of how important it is to include young people in their communities, and the benefits for everybody that would bring. We should encourage young people to play a full and active role in their neighbourhoods.

While always full of admiration for celebrities prepared to use their fame to selflessly advance important causes, or business leaders ready to put their hands in their pockets, no-one inspires me more than a youngster willing to put others before themselves. Take Laura, the winner of a recent YOPEY award, and a wheelchair athlete who has completed numerous long-distance events, all in the name of charity. By getting wealthy companies and individuals to sponsor her performances, she has financed the building and equipping of a play centre for children with special needs. Or take Daniel, who has spent the last two years helping to create a skatepark in a town near to where he lives. No athlete himself, his talents lie elsewhere. He has worked tirelessly to gather together funds for the project, persuading local businesses to get behind his ideas, and local celebrities to contribute.

9 Read the text. Choose the correct answers.

- 1 How does the writer feel about press coverage of young people?
 - A The writer is annoyed that they make up false stories.
 - B The writer wishes they wouldn't focus on all the negative news.
 - C The writer considers the coverage fair and balanced.
 - D The writer chooses to rarely read the news at all.
- 2 According to the text, how do well-known people help the YOPEY campaign?
 - A By either saying they support it, or by giving financial support.
 - B By helping to educate young people in a positive way.
 - C By working with teenagers on schemes to help others.
 - D By providing a positive role model for teenagers to look up to.
- 3 What is the point of presenting awards to young people who have done positive things?
 - A It helps persuade ordinary adults to take part in the YOPEY campaign.
 - B It makes other teenagers want to do something good too.
 - C It raises money for schemes to help other people in need.
 - D It helps deprived youngsters get real jobs in the community.
- 4 Which of the following types of people does the writer admire the most?
 - A Those who are both young and selfless.
 - B Those who have inspired him / her to promote particular causes.
 - C Those who are wealthy and generous.
 - D Those who give up their time despite being famous.
- 5 In what way are Laura and Daniel similar?
 - A They have both achieved a lot in sport.
 - B They have both taken part in sponsored events.
 - C They have both raised money from the business sector.
 - D They have both worked with disabled children.
