Reading

YOPEY

Whilst barely a week goes by without seeing dramatic tabloid headlines about teenage criminality, it is rare to come across any positive stories about young people in the press. Indeed, anyone reading newspapers would conclude that the younger generation must be made up of the worst sort of criminals. That's why Young People of the Year, or YOPEY, is such a breath of fresh air. What it aims to do is give young people a fairer image in the media by highlighting their achievements. It does this by spreading good news stories about young people by asking celebrities, politicians and well-known companies to endorse or sponsor their campaign, and by running schemes which get young people to work with vulnerable older people. Its main focus, though, is on getting ordinary people to nominate under-nineteens in their community who have helped others, and then presenting them with an award. Not only does the award make young people feel positive about themselves, but the publicity surrounding it inspires other kids to try to help in their community. If only the media were to focus on covering award schemes like this one, rather than devoting so much coverage to stories of petty crime. To my mind, it would not only reveal to society just how many young people get a lot out of life by helping their local communities, but it would also remind us all of how important it is to include young people in their communities, and the benefits for everybody that would bring. We should encourage young people to play a full and active role in their neighbourhoods.

While always full of admiration for celebrities prepared to use their fame to selflessly advance important causes, or business leaders ready to put their hands in their pockets, no-one inspires me more than a youngster willing to put others before themselves. Take Laura, the winner of a recent YOPEY award, and a wheelchair athlete who has completed numerous long-distance events, all in the name of charity. By getting wealthy companies and individuals to sponsor her performances, she has financed the building and equipping of a play centre for children with special needs. Or take Daniel, who has spent the last two years helping to create a skatepark in a town near to where he lives. No athlete himself, his talents lie elsewhere. He has worked tirelessly to gather together funds for the project, persuading local businesses to get behind his ideas, and local celebrities to contribute.

9 Read the text. Choose the correct answers.

- 1 In the opening paragraph, the writer suggests that ...
 - A teenagers are to blame for the way they are reported in the media.
 - B the number of young people committing serious crimes is rising.
 - C the newspaper reporting of young people tends to emphasise the negative.
 - D every week the press make up stories about hooliganism and youth crime.

 - B help young people take on jobs in the media.
 - C stop newspapers spreading inaccurate stories about teens.
 - D change the way young people are seen in the press.
- 3 Which of the following is expressed as an opinion rather than a fact in the text?
 - A Politicians and celebrities don't do enough to support young people.
 - B The press is to blame for the anti-social actions of many young people.
 - C Young people should try harder to help out in their communities.
 - D If young people were more involved, society would be nicer.
- 4 The text says that Laura won the award because ...
 - A of her sporting success and help for others.
 - B she worked with children with special needs.
