Reading

Should I take a gap year?

For many British students, deciding whether to take a year out to work or travel, or whether to go straight to university from school instead can be a tough decision. On the one hand, a gap year is useful for students who can't decide which course they want to do at university. Not only does it give them more time to consider their options, but the experience can help them to see things in different ways. It's also a chance to make some money and save up for the university years ahead. On the other hand, it seems a waste of time and money to some to delay their studies when they could be learning the skills required to get the career of their dreams.

These days, the decision about whether to take a gap year or not is complicated by the fact that getting, and paying for, a place at university is not as easy as it once was. In Britain, tuition fees are higher than ever before, and the competition for places at university has never been tougher. A lot of students believe that they have to start university sooner rather than later as the costs can only go up. As a direct result of all this, for a majority of students, having a year out does not seem as practical or sensible an option as it once was and, as a result, numbers of gap-year students are falling.

In the UK, there are travel companies which specialise in organising student gap-year trips, many of which, to my mind, have considerably improved the gap-year experience for young people over the years. These companies have started offering 'mini-gap' trips, which last only three or four months, thus taking advantage of that short window between leaving school in June and starting university in October. They are also offering year-long gap trips which are more vocational than in the past, as well as more courses to train young people to learn a skill.

A recent survey tried to discover how supportive of the gap-year experience future employers might be, and found that young people who had spent a year doing voluntary work or learning a new skill had a clear advantage when it came to job seeking after university. This was because they had done something to make their job applications stand out. Although there can be no career advantage in just travelling around the world and hanging out on beaches, choosing to spend time working with disadvantaged kids in the developing world, or on work placements in offices and factories closer to home, will help young people get a job in the future.

9 Read the text. Choose the correct answers.

- 1 Which of the following reasons for taking a gap year is not mentioned in the text?
  - A It is an opportunity for students to try out aspects of the course they have already chosen to study.
  - B It is a way of gaining some of the necessary funding for the time they will spend in higher education in the future.
  - C It is a means of discovering whether they really want to take one course or another.
  - D It is potentially a period of reflection, which will help them make good decisions later.
- 2 Which of the following does the writer express as an opinion held by some people rather than as a fact?
  - A The cost of going to university is at an all-time high.
  - B Never has it been so hard to get into university.
  - C A future rise in tuition fees is inevitable.
  - D Fewer students are choosing to take a gap year.
- 3 Which of the following is expressed as a fact by the writer?
  - A Gap-year trips have improved over the years.
  - B The number of specialist gap-year organisers has increased in recent years.
  - C The range of gap-year trips on offer has changed recently.
  - D Longer gap-year trips of up to a year have been discontinued.
- 4 Which of the following is described as a recent innovation by gap-year travel companies?
  - A Much longer gap-year trips are being organised.
  - B Gap-year trips are more likely to involve doing some work.
  - C Skills training on gap-year trips has been introduced for the first time.
  - D Gap-year students can now earn money, which they couldn't before.
- 5 Which of the following gap-year choices should young people make if they wish to influence employers?
  - A They should go abroad rather than stay in their own countries.
  - B They ought to go on shorter trips rather than take a whole year.
  - C They should help others rather than just gain personal experiences.
  - D They ought to consider learning skills rather than just getting a job.

Writing

10 Read the task below. Write a blog post.

Your school newspaper published an article saying that school trips to places of interest for students in your year have been cancelled because of cuts in the school's budget. It means that trips to places such as museums and famous monuments will not take place. Write a blog post outlining why you think school trips should not be cancelled and describe your own personal experiences of going on school trips.
